THE YANKEE'S LOCKET

IFTY years ago in old Virginia the North and South were fighting cach other. The fields of corn became trampled meadows of weds, the ences were broken or burned, and even the roads cut deep into ruits by the wheels of the cannon. While amongst the blooming orchards rose the white tents of the cannon. While sire and on which both armies frequently traveled. Sometimes there would be a loud shout and a regiment of Union cavalry in bine would sweep by with flying fags. Then in a few hours perhaps there would be a long line of marching men in gray flying the Confederate colors at the head of the dusty column.

Stuart's father was a soldier in the Confederate army, and as there was no one left to work the farm, the girl did the best she could, with her mother's help, to keep thi. igs running.

Stuart's father was a soldier in the Confederate army, and as there was no one left to work the farm, the girl did the best she could, with her mother's help, to keep thi.gs running.

One bright afternoon at the end of May, Stuart went to milk the cows and as she stooped over the pail near a fence she heard the galloping of hoofs down the road, and a plunging horse dashed into sight. On it sat a Union officer, with blood trickling from a wound in his arm, and just as he got opposite where Stuart sat, he fell to the road, while the horse swept on. Over a distant hill a troop of Confederate cavalry was coming in hot pursuit.

Pitying the wounded man, Stuart ran into the road to drag him to safety, but he was too heavy for her strength. So she rolled him over and over until he was completely hidden in the pokeberry bushes at the side of the path. Hardly had she finished when the Confederates swept by chasing the horse, as they did not know the rider had failen. Stuart bathed the man's face and made him drink a cup of warm milk.

"I am not much hurt," he said, "and I must be going on to join my men."

"If you will stay here till sunset," said Stuart, "I will bring you some supper, and old Molly—she will do to ride back to your lines. But be sure to send her back—she's all the horse we have."

So at dark the officer ate a nice supper Stuart brought him and prepared to mount the boney horses she had led to the bushes.
